He was a member of the OU College of Arts and Sciences Leadership and had interned at the state Senate. A member of the Honors College, Daniel was on the board of OU's Informed Citizens Discussion Group. OU Honors Dean said, "Daniel was truly a brilliant, articulate, profoundly decent, and a deeply idealistic young man." He loved to have political conversations with people of different views, he listened carefully and "didn't tell people they were wrong." Rather, he "always strived to learn more." Daniel planned to become a correspondent for a major news outlet.

He was convicted and sentenced to 15-years hard labor. Except for a videotaped “confession” (in which Otto said he had plotted to steal a poster at the behest of the Methodist Church and the University of Virginia), Otto’s family did not hear from or about him for over a year. Shortly before Otto’s release to the U.S., North Korea informed the Department of State that Otto had contracted botulism and had been in a coma since shortly after his conviction. He was returned to the U.S. on June 13th, still in a coma. Doctors described Otto as in a state of “unresponsive wakefulness,” with brain damage resulting in a persistent vegetative state, likely due to some sort of injury-induced cardiopulmonary arrest. Six days after his return, Otto died. Otto’s family and American authorities remain skeptical of the narrative supplied by North Korea. https://mic.com/articles/180338/otto-warmbier-us-citizen-arrested-by-north-korea-dies-of-injuries#.UhcsJepg6 http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/201	you’ve left them...This is our season finalé. This is the end of one great show, but the beginning to hundreds of new spinoffs.” In college, Otto was a double major in commerce and economics, with a minor in global sustainability. He’d done an internship in London and was going to spend his third college year studying abroad in China. Otto was scheduled to graduate in May of 2017.
